More than half a dozen sexual assault kits go untested Prosecutors do not have to test kits for DNA if they believe the case against the suspect is strong enough, according to law. By MARY CLARE JALONICK capecodtimes.com By MARY CLARE JALONICK Posted Oct. 29, 2012 at 2:00 AM Updated Oct 29, 2012 at 4:57 AM By MARY CLARE JALONICK Posted Oct. 29, 2012 at 2:00 AM Updated Oct 29, 2012 at 4:57 AM » Social News More than half a dozen sexual assault kits in Falmouth have gone untested after they were collected from victims who were never identified, according to a report by the Cape Cod Times. The town has more than 500 sexual assault kits. The kits, of which there are about 30, were collected from rape victims decades ago, and for several years, they remained in storage at the Falmouth Police Department. But now, after police decided to test them all, the town announced Friday that eight of the 30 kits had been tested so far, and at least one suspect — believed to be identified as an unidentified person — has been charged. The procedures for testing the sexual assault kits involved a process of swabbing the face of the victim or swabbing their hands, in order to collect their DNA, according to investigators. A Times report last month raised concern e79caf774b
