The benefits of vocal rest, vocal hygiene, and voice therapy for patients with voice disorders are well documented. However, the current techniques for treating voice disorders can result in long recovery times. There is growing interest in the use of newer vocal intervention techniques for treating voice disorders. This study explores the effectiveness of vocal biofeedback (VB) for treating voice disorders. The study includes a prospective, observational, cohort study design. Patients referred to the Voice and Swallowing Center for evaluation of voice disorders completed standard and VB evaluation. After initial evaluation, the patients were given a 10-minute, in-office VB treatment. Patients were evaluated after the VB treatment. The baseline and VB treatment data were compared to determine if any differences were present. VB therapy was offered to 91 consecutive patients, and 79 completed the treatment. Pre- and post-treatment difference between standard voice and VB groups in the Dysphonia Handicap Index (DHI), the voice range profile (VRP), the maximum phonation time (MPT), and maximum intensity (MI) were analyzed.
