I know that a Windows NT version is not used in the current release of Windows that is shipped with Windows XP. But I don't know if they ever shipped that as Windows 98. A house divided: the relationship between depressive and anxiety symptoms and cognitive, behavioral and somatic symptoms in adolescent girls with an eating disorder. The purpose of this study was to examine the relationship between depression and anxiety, and their relationship to cognitive, behavioral and somatic symptoms among adolescents with an eating disorder. Participants were 545 adolescent girls from the Eating Disorders Examination Study. Adolescents with and without an eating disorder were compared on depression and anxiety, cognitive, behavioral and somatic symptoms using three analyses of covariance: 1. adjusted for age and grade, 2. adjusted for the presence/absence of an eating disorder, and 3. adjusted for the presence/absence of an eating disorder and the presence of a psychopathology other than anxiety or depression. Girls with and without an eating disorder did not differ in terms of anxiety and depression, or cognitive, behavioral and somatic symptoms. Controlling for the presence of psychopathology, higher scores on all dimensions of anxiety and depression and somatic symptoms were associated with a higher likelihood of having an eating disorder. Adolescents with an eating disorder do not differ in their levels of depression and anxiety from adolescents without an eating disorder. However, adolescents with an eating disorder experience significantly higher levels of anxiety and depressive symptoms, cognitive, behavioral and somatic symptoms than adolescents without an eating disorder, even after controlling for the presence of other psychopathology.
