Humans usually lay eggs outside the womb. However, modern medicine has enabled a rare pregnancy in which the woman gives birth to a baby using her own body. A woman in Mississippi gave birth using a procedure referred to as uterus transplant, which has been used mostly in animals. It was used for the first time on April 20, 2016, in Boston to save the life of a woman who was suffering from the condition known as uterine factor infertility, which stops a fertilised egg from implanting into a woman's uterus. She named the baby Isabel. Isabel has two healthy hearts, her parents have released to the media. The 38-year-old woman named her daughter Isabel after the memory of her own mother. Isabel's care is now covered by the state's Medicaid programme, and she will soon be able to get in vitro fertilisation, so that she can conceive a second child. "This gives me hope and the opportunity of having another child." "It's emotionally taxing," he said, "You're also asking someone to be part of a child's birth and that's really hard for anyone. Even for people who have it in the back of their mind that they want to be a parent, it's hard to fully get there. It's a big deal." It affects about one in every 1,500 girls. In the last two decades, researchers, doctors, and patients have come up with various ways of overcoming this condition. In 2015, a French team proposed using a test
