The present invention relates to information processing apparatuses for selectively outputting the data on the number of pieces of check stock stored in a circulation passage of a bank. There are some conventional apparatuses for calculating the number of pieces of check stock stored in a circulation passage of a bank to prevent the shortage of check stock. In such conventional apparatuses, the number of pieces of check stock is calculated on the basis of a check number or a reference number of check stock, which is registered in a check manual. Conventionally, the calculation of the check stock has been facilitated by connecting the bank and the apparatus with the network system by a communication means. However, the conventional apparatuses have a problem that it is impossible to accurately calculate the number of pieces of check stock stored in a circulation passage of the bank. There have been some proposals for providing the solution to the problem. For example, there is proposed an apparatus for calculating the number of pieces of check stock stored in a circulation passage of a bank. f988f36e3a
