to defend his decision to discuss the possibility of ending the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program with Democratic lawmakers. "I think it's something I have to do, certainly it's something I

This invention relates to a process for concentrating hydrocarbons from carbonaceous material. More particularly, it relates to a novel process for the recovery of petroleum from coals, petroleum coke and solid carbonaceous material residues. For many years there has been substantial demand for petroleum products derived from petroleum coke. This demand has not been met without considerable difficulty. Petroleum coke is a solid residue of petroleum processing that has both commercial and environmental uses. The major portion of the petroleum coke is in the form of irregularly shaped chunks ranging in size up to 30 inches in diameter that vary considerably in their solubility. It has been the problem in the development of commercial processes for the use of petroleum coke that it is difficult to process the petroleum coke in conventional refining practice due to the high incipient carbonization temperatures which are established during the early stages of the refining process. Often the petroleum coke can not be processed and disposed of as a commercial fuel and the only alternative is to produce a solid from petroleum coke which is not as high in value as the original petroleum coke. Various procedures have been developed for the liquefaction of petroleum coke. These techniques have invariably involved the addition of a "fluxing" agent to the petroleum coke during the liquefaction process. Most conventional processes for the liquefaction of petroleum coke involve using a hydrocarbon diluent to increase the liquefaction rate by decreasing the solid coke loading and controlling the incipient carbonization temperatures. Most conventional methods use a heat transfer medium during the liquefaction process which is generally supplied by a hot flue gas stream from the coke gasifier, a portion of the shale 6d1f23a050
