Windows 10 has been out for more than a month, and while you're probably enjoying all of the new features, some bugs are likely to emerge. A handful of Windows 10 users have reported their systems getting temporarily locked up or having problems while playing games, trying to access social networking sites, or using specific apps. Windows 10 contains around 5GB of bug-related changes, according to a new report from The Verge. The new feature is coming to Windows 8.1, Windows Phone, and Windows RT and will be available from the Windows Update portal. Once the update is done, you will be able to get updates to Windows Media Player and a variety of other apps in Windows Store through an update. These are the apps that are still not available in Windows Store and currently in play, and the update will push them to the Store. About an hour before the scheduled announcement, Microsoft is making the updated software available in preview. iTunes for Windows 10 and Mac is a buggy, slow, resource-consuming, unmaintained software application for PC's and Mac's.
