A patient, aged 41, complained of chronic fatigue and lack of physical activity, for almost 4 years. In our hospital, he was diagnosed as chronic fatigue syndrome and was treated with Zoloft at 400 mg/day, which was followed by 400 mg/day Quetiapine. After 2 months of treatment, he was better. However, despite the decrease in Quetiapine, he again complained of symptoms such as severe chest, back, and head pain, elevated temperature, muscle wasting, and weakness. He was diagnosed as somatization disorder by consultation with psychiatrist and doctor of mental health. We changed his dosage of Quetiapine to 400 mg/day, and his condition improved. In addition, we considered whether the effect of Quetiapine on chronic fatigue syndrome was not caused by somatization disorder. He has received Quetiapine at a daily dose of 150 mg for many years, and we planned to add Bozephenn 20 mg. However, he refused to take it, because he could not tolerate any of the side effects such as headache, dry mouth, insomnia, dizziness, etc. Therefore, we planned to decrease the dosage of Quetiapine. Actually, there is a report saying that Quetiapine is effective for somatization disorder. Although the side effects are possibly due to the inhibitory action of Quetiapine, the efficacy of Quetiapine is not always associated with somatization disorder. not be empty.
