The structure and function of mammalian dynein intermediate chains. Mammalian dynein intermediate chain (DIC) homologues have been identified by chance homology sequences encoded on BAC clones of the human genome project. These clones have served as tools to identify the biological function of dynein by loss- and gain-of-function studies. In contrast, the protein structural biology of the DIC isoforms is almost completely missing, with the exception of the N-terminal peptides that are known to bind different dynactin proteins. The focus of this review is the search for ligands of the DIC isoforms by two-hybrid screening in a DIC-DYN1-containing complex, but with special emphasis on the identification of binding sites of DIC-DYN1. By using the potential binding sites revealed by the two-hybrid screen, we identified the DIC-specific class of binding proteins. Finally, we discuss the potential use of the mammalian DIC homologues in diagnostics and in the development of new therapies. beta 2-microglobulin in blood transudate: a sensitive indicator of the renal disease spectrum in diabetic patients.
