Clinical evaluation of immunoradiometric assay for carcinoembryonic antigen (CEA): a critical review. In this study, we review the comparison study of two immunoradiometric assays (IRMA) for the quantification of carcinoembryonic antigen (CEA) in serum. The assay method developed by Microwells is a direct IRMA, while those from Genzyme, and Toyo are used after a solid-phase immunopurification of CEA. This paper outlines the analytical characteristics of these two IRMAs to provide readers with an important background in the monitoring of CEA concentrations using these assay methods. The reference range established in about 1,000 healthy males by the Microwells method was 0.3-11 microg/L with a median value of 0.5 microg/L. The reference ranges for the Genzyme (0-365 microg/L) and Toyo (0-60 microg/L) methods were identical. In another 656 healthy males, the median Microwells value was about one half of the Genzyme values. In 110 patients with non-neoplastic disease, the median concentrations of CEA were similar when measured by Microwells (median, 54 microg/L; range, 0.5-803 microg/L) and the Genzyme method (median, 58 microg/L; range, 2-874 microg/L), while the Microwells value was less than the Toyo value (0-40 microg/L) in all these patients. In patients with colonic adenocarcinoma, the median CEA concentrations were higher than those in controls for all the three assays, and significantly higher for both the Microwells and Genzyme methods. Five sera from patients with advanced colonic adenocarcinoma contained CEA concentrations of about 10,000 microg/L, with much higher values observed in a few patients. What's new:

Space Block Buster is an educational television series aimed at

children aged six to thirteen that was originally broadcast from 1986 to 1990, with the last two series originally being broadcast in 1992. It featured a large range of language arts activities, including writing and drawing based on text, observation of characters, knowing word and sentence structure, lists and weather. The sets and locations were well designed and were aimed at encouraging young children's imagination by playing out the story sequences, enabling them to involve themselves with parts of the storyline. Children were also able to choose single activity sequences such as a "word wall" or a "weather wall" to complete. Space Block Buster was devised and produced by Dinah McDowell and produced by Martyn Appleford. Series one was written by Derek Webb. Charles Annandale and Roger Mosey were the creators for series two onwards. Characters The series was originally set in the year 1996. All the characters, with the exception of Barney, Lisa and a minor one called George, resemble familiar television characters and landmarks from the 1980s. Nor of the show did characters age, though the producers have indicated that it was not their intention to make the characters children's main interest. Professor Croc Professor Croc was a human character who lived in the year 1996 as an old fella, he was a cynical character by nature and his catchphrase "huh" and his liking of drinking cocktail sausages were a running joke for characters to enjoy. He also had a sidekick named Gaddesbuck. Professor Croc did not actually live, he was a "science fiction character" who was fronting the show for the cast and crew, the character however used his trademark attitude to keep each episode's storyline in mind, although he would sometimes disappear entirely for episodes or be occasionally aged as a type of joke. Recurring characters Some of the other characters, who appeared in various episodes including outer space, were: The Krikbots: A cartoon who partnered Professor Croc and gave him advice, after hearing him giving the baneing speech on live television. The Krikbots, whose character design bore an obvious resemblance to the boxy television characters of the 1980s such as Mr Men and Little Princess. The Krikbots quipped around only, although they would occasionally need to ask for their other screens to be fixed (which were actually robot spaceships). It
