Gemini notified law enforcement of both breaches shortly after discovering them. Key Food Stores first announced the breach on March 2, and later released an updated statement on July 16 reporting that even its EMV transactions had been compromised. While the public statement claimed that we believe only the card number and expiration date would have been found by the malware (but not the cardholder name or internal verification code), Gemini has observed additional data exposed in the dark web that includes the iCVV, which can be substituted for a CVV in magstripe data to clone a card. This cloned card can place fraudulent transactions depending on the banks verification process, as referenced above. The malware, therefore, must have harvested magstripe-equivalent payment card data from EMV-enabled POS terminals. A similar strain likely also infected Mega Package Store.

Proper iCVV verification from banks should thwart this technique. In this webinar you will discover more about how Gemini CADs Software suite can revolutionize your creative and manufacturing workflow How to deploy HPs Smart digital printing solutions to print on demand Meet the team at Klieverik to learn how efficient, Heat Transfer machinery can improve production agility and performance. Gemini data indicates that this technique is already in use among the cybercriminal underground. On January 16, 2020, Gemini identified a massive breach of Key Food Stores Co-Operative Inc., a supermarket chain cooperative with affiliates largely (but not exclusively) in the northeastern United States. Many of the supermarkets in this cooperative use point-of-sale (POS) terminals that support EMV transactions with distinct network security systems. The payment cards stolen during this breach were offered for sale in the dark web. Shortly after discovering this breach, several financial institutions confirmed that the cards compromised in this breach were all processed as EMV and did not rely on the magstripe as a fallback. Analysts had speculated that payment card data on the EMV chip was compromised and repurposed for cloned magstripe cards, and Cyber R&D Labs recent revelations provide further clarity into the likely attack vector.
