At first glance, that Adobe is moving into the mobile photography world seems like quite a radical enterprise. However, Adobe is no stranger to the area of mobile photography. With the introduction of its zoom feature, Adobe proved it is capable of making mobile photography a first-class experience. The effects of zooming are very important. Well before Lightroom 4, CS4 was featured with Face Templates. Those templates helped photographers to create attractive images of mini portraits by using face recognition. It is great that the company is continuing to deliver innovative features for the mobile photography user. It's made me wonder, however, whether the average user will be willing to use such a feature. This is a product for the professional and sophisticated user who is willing to adapt to a new workflow. And that's my conclusion: When reading the description, people should be ware that they are not using applications that haven't been released yet. When I installed Lightroom, I was impressed by the fact that even after an older version was installed, the application did not become read-only. The new model has a different focus, with a RAW workflow. Adobe is arguing that the fact that you can now edit the data with the RAW format is a big win, and I agree. The biggest thing I noticed was how much faster I could work now, and how much quicker RAWs load. The first issue I often encountered on a previous Mac was how slow RAWs loaded on a Mac, those images were slow to open and only got worse over time. The new camera, on the other hand, is super fast. Editing my RAW files was like shooting in RAW and then editing them in Adobe. The workflow is so quick that it's a pleasure to use. Again, needs to be ran on a machine that meets the minimum requirements. My Surface Pro with 4 GB of RAM easily handled any image editing and productivity tasks.

Choose the Brush Tool you'd like to use and then simply click on your canvas to begin painting with your color. When you right-click or Control+click on an area in your photo, you should see a list of options appear above your mouse cursor. Choose the one you want to use from the list and then click on your canvas to actually make the changes. How Do I Use It: Within the Tools palette, you'll find various tools there. You can select from a large number of brush styles, or from one of the preset styles, offered by the tool. You can also choose from dozens of gradient-based blending options, including Offset, Multiply, Screen, Color, Linear, Radial, Gradient Overlay, Layer Mask, Soft Light, Hard Light, Dodge, Burn, Darken, and Blend. Now, make sure that your layer is selected -- and either click...(on your canvas) and drag on the area you want to recolor, or press both Control+A to select it all, if you want to recolor everything in sight. 933d7f57e6
