Yeah, the computer game "Red Dead Redemption".Obama, Congress, the Mayans, and the End of the World This is going to sound stupid, but I was thinking about the Mayans the other day, when I heard President Obama say how he was going to change the American tax code. He wasn't saying that he was going to give up his right to gun ownership because he can't pass any law that would accomplish this. He also wasn't saying that he was going to change the Second Amendment because he can't pass any law that would accomplish this. No, he was saying that he wanted to change the tax code because he couldn't pass any law that would accomplish this. What he was hinting at is that he didn't think it was possible to propose a budget that would take care of the common good. One way to justify that is that a new tax code is too complicated to enact. However, it would seem pretty logical to me that it is the new tax code that is too complicated to enact, thus the old tax code must be good, because it's simple. I don't know about you, but if you come up with a budget that isn't even remotely elegant, that isn't even remotely elegant, it's good and logical. If you can't come up with a budget that takes care of all the common good and then some, then it's simply because the system is too complicated. Like it or not, the tax code is part of the system. You can't easily create a new system that allows for savings, investment, and more efficient public spending without creating a tax code that is complex enough to do this. The tax code is the mechanism that makes it happen. Yes, some of the tax code is really stupid, but if you could get rid of the stupid tax code, then it would be simplicity, not more complexity. The reason that I have been thinking about the Mayans is because I'm currently reading an article by writer John Allen on how the Mayans ran out of time, didn't recognize their own
